

Biden's Spending Now Makes Sense, but ONLY in His Mind.

Spend, spend, spend and keep spending until the printer runs dry. Since the beginning of Biden's term in the Oval Office, he consistently has endorsed massive spending. Just the other day, he confirmed that he considers his outrageous spending proposals to actually help the economy and inflation.

I recently read an article by Corey Iacono from the Foundation for Economic Education (www.FEE.org) that looks at the effect of large government spending on the economy. Nearing the conclusion, it states the following:

In developed countries, limiting the size of government can help the economy grow faster. Studies explicitly looking at the non-linear relationship between government size and growth typically find that government spending hurts growth after it exceeds 25-30 percent of GDP. One paper found that over three-quarters of developed countries have levels of government spending that are detrimental to their growth. The author concluded that, "The concern about large governments is not misplaced. Ever-expanding governments will have negative effects on long-run growth."

(Article: Does Government Spending Help the Economy? - Foundation for Economic Education \(fee.org\) )

Certainly Biden has come to his own conclusion with the help of whoever is talking into his ear, but with inflation an ever so reality perhaps he needs to take a step back and sign his resignation papers. His policies, all of his policies, are failing America. My suggestion is that if, or when, he leaves that he needs to take Kamamalala and Aunt Nancy with him.

Biden's ideas are certainly his own, but they appear to suppress Capitalism and seem to prep Americans for a life under Socialism. A life that nobody wants. Just ask the citizens of Cuba or Venezuela.
